

When the Rev. Christopher (Chris) A. Hart's dad was laid off from his electrical engineering job in the mid-1980s, the family moved from southern California to Colville, Washington, where they opened up a business. The Harts started attending First Congregational United Church of Christ. At first, teenage Chris was not enthusiastic about church, but his perspective changed when he met Jennifer, a young volunteer in the nursery. Soon Chris was involved in youth groups and community events.

As high school graduation approached, Chris started thinking about where his path would lead. The Persian Gulf War brought fears of a military draft. He thought seriously about enlisting. But one day, at his niece's swimming competition, he heard a child crying and a line from a familiar hymn came to him: "I will hold your people in my heart." At that moment, he thought, "I'm here. I need to go find out why that child is crying. It's me that is supposed to go." Chris went to help until the parent came. He thought, "Maybe God might be calling me to something in a different direction." Instead of the military, he turned his eyes to ministry.

First, Chris earned a B.S. in developmental psychology from Eastern Washington University. He and Jennifer were married. He went on to Eden Theological Seminary, graduating in 2008, and was ordained in 2009.

Chris' first call was to a church-affiliated residence for at-risk youth. Although he found the work fulfilling, he and the leadership were not an ideal fit and he left in the summer of 2011. The Harts, who now had three young sons, had to pay for health and dental coverage out of their savings. Family stepped in to help, but eventually, their options ran out.

Chris had heard about the Christmas Fund as a kid in Colville, but didn't know much about it. His Conference recommended him for a grant, and he received enough assistance to cover two months of health and dental insurance for his family while he continued to look for work.

As of January 2012, Chris has been serving as Interim Pastor at Elias United Church of Christ in Newmaston, Pennsylvania. As he looks toward the time when his interim placement ends, he is hoping to serve in an agency that works with children and families or as a pastor. When asked what he would say to those considering an offering to the Christmas Fund, Chris says, "It can be a genuine reminder that God's love is still there, and that is powerful stuff."
